Journalistic gatekeeping in the digital age

Gatekeeping is the process through which information is filtered for dissemination, whether for publication, broadcasting, the Internet, or some other mode of communication. Individuals can also act as gatekeepers, deciding what information to include in an email or in a blog .With the improvement of new correspondence advancements, gatekeeping has developed. as an interaction. In the computerised age, buyers and heads of data oftentimes take. over the piece of doorkeepers in choosing what merits distributing. The orders of the source, channel, and giver of data have likewise changed.The hand of our times is data load with the going with torrential slide of data, and without a doubt data bandage The avalanche of information makes it impossible to convey everything to the public, therefore the inherent mechanism accompanying the information circulating in the new media is filtering it, which is the basis for currently understood gatekeeping. As Szpunar notes: “We live dominated by a data fetish, with the imperative of the computable and quantifiable world”.he tempestuous and dynamic states of the advanced climate require a new take a gander at the peculiarity of gatekeeping. In the light of the accompanying contemplations, two fundamental exploration issues have been recognized. They concern the idea of social gatekeeping, which puts the emphasis on clients going about as watchmen, and the impact of calculations on this interaction, as an inborn component of online media engineering.

In this unique situation, the accompanying inquiries were thought of as essential: "Is it legitimate to guarantee that each web-based media client goes about as a guardian?" and, "Are online media calculations supplanting the traditionally gotten watches?".The role of a gatekeeper within journalism is of extreme importance in today's media environment. Gatekeepers ultimately craft and conduct what is being published to the masses, therefore they determine what is to become the public's social reality, and their view of the world (Shoemaker & Vos, 2009).

A gatekeeper is a person who controls access, either to someone in authority or to information. Gatekeepers can also decide whether a message will be spread to a wider audience. Assistants, receptionists and secretaries can act as gatekeepers.An example can be in the news or press area. The news editor plays the role of the gatekeeper. S/he has to decide which kind of news stories will be aired and in which manner and which ones won't. Some, if not all media outlets have their own set of house rules, ethics or policies to be followed. These are some of the aspects that will guide the editor towards making an informed decision. In some cases some news items are rejected by the editor due to the organisations house policy or the news items which are not suitable for publishing, this is also considered part of the gate-keeping function.

Just like other theories, the gate-keeping theory does receive backlash and criticism too. The most basic one being that the theory suggests there is only one gate, but in reality, there might be many. Only because other avenues have not been explored or identified, it doesn't mean there is only one gatekeeper.

Another criticism is that editors and other gatekeepers change the priority of news causing influence in societies like racism, sexism, and classism. This is because they might want to achieve or to shape society in a particular way.

Gate-keeping has become less in today's news broadcast due to internet media and people posting anything and everything. In an era where we can get access to real news before the mainstream media breaks it, we don't rely on gate-keeping hence they seem irrelevant.

In some other serious conditions, powerful people or governments play the role of gatekeeping for their own benefit or due for their safety. Gatekeeping in media is all over the country .This study contributes to the theory of gatekeeping by examining how community media journalists in Sub-Saharan Africa navigate through conflicting information. Using the case of COVID-19, the study examined how journalists from community media in Zambia and Tanzania reported government information that conflicted with what the local communities they served believed to be untrue. Drawing from interviews with journalists from community media organizations, we were able to demonstrate that there was a schism between what the editors thought as newsworthy versus what the reporters believed as possessing journalistic values relevant for their communities. Unlike the reporters, most editors aligned much with what the government wanted the media to transmit. This is especially true in Zambia where reporters indicated that most of their stories were flagged as irrelevant by their editors. These findings are then examined through the lens of gatekeeping, particularly a focus on various levels of analysis.

What should the journalistic keep?

There is this well known case that the writer's first unwaveringly is to reality. This is one of the most confounding of the standards. I think honest announcing is basic to the nature of data. One of its key credits is that it is dependable in light of the fact that it permits people to utilize it to decipher and settle on choices suitable to every friendly setting.

As a professional, journalists have the ability to carry out their work well. He is bound to the rules in terms of journalistic ethics. In Indonesia there is a journalistic code of ethics which has also been regulating and maintaining journalists to remain professional. Ethical standards for journalists in Indonesia are in the journalistic code of ethics created by the Indonesian Press Council. In their book The Elements of Journalism, Bill Kovach and Tom Rosenstiel identify the essential principles and practices of journalism. There are: 1) Journalism's first obligation is the truth; 2) Its first loyalty is to citizens; 3) Its essence is a discipline of verification; 4) Its practitioners must maintain an independence from those they cover; 5) It must serve as an independent monitor of power; 6) It must provide a forum for public criticism and compromise; 7) It must strive to keep the significant interesting and relevant; 8) It must keep the news comprehensive and proportional; 9). Its practitioners must be allowed to exercise their personal conscience; 10) Citizens, too, have rights and responsibilities when it comes to the news [9]. The journalism elements of Kovach and Rosenstiel seem to remind journalism how the role should be in society. Starting from the problem of media ownership that intervenes in the editorial room, to market pressure makes journalists lose their proper role. Journalist autonomy is the power of journalists and journalistic organisations that allows them to present their interpretation of reality as accurate, correct and politically important. Autonomy was divided into three categories, namely; operational, allocative and administrative. Operational autonomy is operationalised as journalists' freedom in their work and do they feel themselves free to write or discuss whatever they feel right. Allocative autonomy is conceptualises as to what extent journalists are given the share of a total amount in the development of their organisation. Do they think they are playing any role in determining the strategic goals of their organisations? While administrative autonomy is related to the arrangements and work which is needed to control the operation of a plan or organisation. Whether they need to follow any administrative instructions while planning coverage of any event [10]. Reich and Hanitzsch find autonomy to be restricted on two levels – one external and one internal. The external dimension is related to coercive forces restricting the political autonomy of the news organisation, including policy, state censorship, legislation and regulation. Internal restrictions relate to journalists' freedom to make decisions free from management pressures, commercial factors and forces inside the news environment. As individual and organisational autonomy are interrelated concepts, separating the two levels is no easy task. [11] The increasingly fierce competition between the media in Indonesia has made journalists and their news spaces carried by market currents. The gatekeepers always make analytic references in determining the news to be presented to readers. As a result, gatekeepers have fewer and fewer areas of journalist autonomy. It could be that journalists are not aware of the journalists' autonomy they have. Because the journalists who enter the media companies lately are also young people or fresh graduates from schools who do not know how traditional journalism works like the print media newsroom or live or any media .

CONCLUSION

Nowadays the gatekeeper of online media who determines the news, is entering a transformation to face changes in existing technology. Nevertheless, the important gatekeeper war is still awaited because of the rampant information revised by the Gatekeeper media which has an important role in shaping public opinion. But market appetite pressures are coming through analytic practices in the media newsroom.